Here are the average summer and winter temperatures of four cities in North America: Columbus, Hopeville, Lansfield, and Rockport. The temperature of Lansfield in the summer was much higher than I expected—the highest in fact. By comparison, Rockport had a much cooler summer than Lansfield and experienced the coldest winter among the four cities. Columbus was a bit cooler than Rockport in the summer, while its winter was a few degrees warmer. Hopeville changed the least in temperature and was just a bit cooler than Lansfield in the summer.

Questions No. 27 to 32

OK. What is blue carbon? You know, humans produce too much CO₂, a greenhouse gas. This creates problems with the earth's climate. But remember how trees help us by absorbing CO₂ from the air and releasing oxygen? Trees change CO₂ into organic carbon, which is stored in biomass. Biomass includes things like leaves and trunks. The organic carbon in the biomass then goes into the soil. This organic carbon is called "green" carbon. But listen! Plants growing on ocean coasts can also take in and store CO₂ as organic carbon in biomass and soil—just like trees on dry land do. That's called "blue" carbon.

Blue carbon is created by seagrasses, mangroves, and plants in saltwater wetlands. These blue carbon ecosystems cover much less surface of the earth than is covered by green carbon forests. However, they store carbon very efficiently—much more carbon per hectare than green carbon forests do. The carbon in the soil of the ocean floor is covered by layers of mud, and can stay there for millions of years. In contrast, the carbon in land soil is so close to the surface that it can easily mix with air, and then be released as CO₂.

Currently the blue carbon ecosystem is in trouble. For this ecosystem to work, it is absolutely necessary to look after ocean coasts. For example, large areas of mangroves are being destroyed. When this happens, great amounts of blue carbon are released back into the atmosphere as CO₂. To avoid this, ocean coasts must be restored and protected. Additionally, healthy coastline ecosystems will support fish life, giving us even more benefits.

Question No. 33

Look at this graph, which compares blue and green carbon storage. Notice how much organic carbon is stored in each of the four places. The organic carbon is stored in soil and in biomass but in different proportions. What can we learn from this?

Questions No. 34 and 35

Carol: What are you doing, Bob?

Bob: I'm writing a letter to my grandmother.

Carol: Nice paper! But isn't it easier just to write her an email?

Bob: Well, perhaps. But I like shopping for stationery, putting pen to paper, addressing the envelope, and going to the post office. It gives me time to think about my grandma.

Carol: Uh-huh. But that's so much trouble.

Bob: Not really. Don't you think your personality shines through in a handwritten letter? And it makes people happy. Plus, it has cognitive benefits.

Carol: What cognitive benefits?

Bob: You know, handwriting is good for thinking processes, like memorizing and decision making.

Carol: Really? I'm a more fluent writer when I do it on a computer.

Bob: Maybe you are, but you might also sacrifice something with that efficiency.

Carol: Like what?

Bob: Well, mindfulness, for one.

Carol: Mindfulness?

Bob: Like taking time to do things with careful consideration. That's being lost these days. We should slow down and lead a more mindful life.

Carol: Speaking of mindful, I wouldn't mind some chocolate-chip ice cream.

Questions No. 36 and 37

Brad: Hey, Kenji. Did you vote yet? The polls close in two hours.

Kenji: Well, Brad, who should I vote for? I don't know about politics.

Brad: Seriously? You should be more politically aware.

Kenji: I don't know. It's hard. How can I make an educated choice? What do you think, Alice?

Alice: The information is everywhere, Kenji! Just go online. Many young people are doing it.

Kenji: Really, Alice? Many?

Brad: Either way, you should take more interest in elections.

Kenji: Is everybody like that? There's Helen. Let's ask her. Hey Helen!

Helen: Hello, Kenji. What's up?

Kenji: Are you going to vote?

Helen: Vote? We're only twenty. Most people our age don't care about politics.

Alice: Being young is no excuse.

Helen: But unlike older people, I'm just not interested.

Brad: Come on, Helen. Let's just talk. That might change your mind.

Alice: Brad's right. Talking with friends keeps you informed.

Kenji: Really? Would that help?

Brad: It might, Kenji. We can learn about politics that way.

Alice: So, Kenji, are you going to vote or not?

Kenji: Is my one vote meaningful?

Alice: Every vote counts, Kenji.

Helen: I'll worry about voting when I'm old. But do what you want!

Kenji: OK, I'm convinced. We've got two hours. Let's figure out who to vote for!
